This course is suitable for both parents and professionals although it is addressed primarily to parents, with a focus on parenting. While the material applies equally to the school setting, the day-care setting, and to direct treatment venues, those involved in such settings may need to engage in some transposing of the material. This usually happens quite spontaneously and intuitively on the part of professionals.

The principles discussed in this workshop are applicable to children of all ages.

The focus of this course is on everyday parenting and everyday problems but the material applies even more so to the more challenging

scenarios and problems.

This course can be used for professional development, personal growth, preparation for parenting and even as a primer or enrichment for grand-parenting.

In order for parenting to work, children - including teenagers - must be in right relationship to their parents. Nothing is more crucial or pivotal in parenting than this seldom recognized or addressed factor. Many parenting books and courses focus on skills, methods and techniques for child behaviour. In this course, however, Dr. Neufeld explains the concept of right relationship, the essential power behind the skills and techniques and then he provides practical suggestions for parenting children of all ages with attachment in mind.

Children are meant to be raised in the context of their attachments to the adults responsible and nothing will work right unless this context is cultivated and preserved.

Sadly this context, which used to come naturally to parents, has been eroded away by societal trends. This course will reignite the parenting intuition, confidence and knowledge to enable you to be the parent your child needs.

Participants will take this as a videocourse facilitated by Kaye McKean who is authorized through the Neufeld Institute.

Registrations are essential, numbers strictly limited, so please phone or email to reserve your place.
